

WASATCH

Continued from S-1

he is looking for," says a friend who occasionally skis for Noble's camera. "He also seems to know exactly what the editors of various publications want. He doesn't waste time out there."

Unlike many other photographers, Noble doesn't have a darkroom. He doesn't need to make his own prints. "Most of the publications I've written for only need color slides anyway," he says. "And no one can develop Kodachrome but Kodak."

Because he's "paid his dues," Noble's talent is recognized. He no longer writes and takes photos on speculation. "I figure if the editors don't want to pay me up front to go to Alaska or wherever, they aren't really interested in publishing the article anyway," he says.

And as his talent becomes more recognized, Noble is branching out. He takes photos of river running, now. And sea kayaking. Both are sports he's just learning. He has to learn them because he is writing about and photographing them.

He has also begun taking wildlife photos. In Katmai National Park on the Alaskan Peninsula, Noble did what he considers to be some of his most important work. "The landscape is very subtle there," he says. "It lacks the drama of, say, the Alaskan Range." In this park, the last large sanctuary for the Alaskan brown bear, Noble found 10 or 12 bears together, at a river, feeding on salmon. He captured them on film.

Does wildlife photography seem more dangerous than adventure photography? "Not at all," says Noble. "Ski models are much less predictable than bears."

He talks about the time, in Germany, when he positioned himself under a cornice of snow to catch a skier as he came over the edge. Catch him on film, that is. But unfortunately Noble caught him quite literally.

Neither was hurt when the skier landed on him. "He didn't speak much English and I didn't speak much German. I guess I thought I was communicating where I wanted him to land," says Noble. "But he didn't quite get it."

From Germany to Alaska — sometimes it seems Noble is everywhere at once. A recent issue of Powder magazine carried two articles written and photographed by Chris Noble. One was an evaluation of the newest mountaineering skis, boots, and bindings. The other was a guide to hut-to-hut skiing in North America. (He writes: Tonight for the first time in weeks, I find myself in a shelter large enough to stand erect and warm enough so I can write these words sprawled on a bench, rather than huddled in a sleeping bag, puffing on fingers stiff with cold.)

Noble travels a lot. He does four major projects a year — either photographing or writing or both. Noble is gone from his Salt Lake home for months at a time. He just completed a guide to outdoor adventure in Alaska that he researched on three separate trips. The article will appear in June in Outside magazine.

Chris Noble takes photos from a sportsman's perspective.

His photos and articles have appeared in Outside, Backpacker, Powder and Geo magazines. Noble has written, also, an apocryphal-sounding story about a mountain-climber named John Slater. The story appears in a book called "Ascent: The Mountaineering Experience in Word and Image," published by the Sierra Club. It is a modern fairy tale about a climber who was lured to his death (or nearly) by a mysterious, ghostly woman. Perhaps because of the days and weeks he has spent in the wilderness, Noble believes in things not easily explained. Truth is in the eye of the beholder. He writes:

"I have found that when a man speaks what he thinks is the truth — and there are all kinds of truth — you can read the pain or the joy of it in his face as he speaks. A liar speaks right to you, because he is always measuring the weight of his words as he goes, but a man telling what he believes looks through you because he is seeing the thing itself and not merely its effect upon his audience."

Like the mountain climber John Slater, Noble is a man telling what he believes — through words and pictures.

Chris Noble wants to take on larger projects: he is, now, at work on his first book, called "Utah Ski Guide," published by the Utah Geographic Series. The fact that his first book is about skiing in Utah is serendipitous. After skiing and taking pictures of the world's major mountains, Noble still recognizes what he has in his own backyard. In the upcoming lecture he will give on the Wasatch Front, Noble says, "I want to talk about what it means to have a mountain range like this, so close to an urban area."

Brooke Williams is writing the text for "Utah Ski Guide," and skiing each slope that Noble photographs. "Adventure photography is not a hobby with him," says Williams. "It is interesting to me that he took up this profession because he loves to ski, but that he loves photography so intensely that he sacrifices skiing to do it. When we are standing together at the top of a bowl of fresh powder, he leaves it untouched. He snakes off to the side, skiing through the trees, to set up for the shot — of me, making the first tracks through the snow."

Chris Noble will speak on "Recreation in the Wasatch: An Active Response to our Environment" as part of the Wasatch Front Lecture Series sponsored by the Utah Museum of Natural History, on Wednesday, Feb. 19, at 7:30 p.m. in the Highland High School auditorium, Salt Lake City.

A return

By Mary Bowring

■ Mrs. Bowring is a living in Kaysville.

A film clip of the old show the other day pre feature about the old ha fering now become a son program, with many y and old people sitting watch the antics of Aunt Bea.

Mayberry was such a American sort of place ing was good, the townsy thetic and helpful to th the sheriff firm but kind cause there was no s Small wonder that we a turn to someplace akin

Now that Andy Gri gained popularity, perha question of time bel Knows Best," "My Thre zel," make their way ba it is possible to tune in t Beaver," and one of my looks forward to watchi dad. She likes it for wha the happy memories of l

It seems

If you don't believe th their faith in something themselves, read on.

A woman in Wichita, sale on maternity clothe off. The fact that neither married daughters were not deter her. She calle ters, marched them in t clothes, using pillows to effect. In her maternal said, "I'll put this in God's be someday you will need

Here's the kicker. Toda an has four grandchildren

With my luck, if I had t ternity dress on sale, I gained 40 pounds for no r

I too have put my fu hands of fate. Before the saw the dress of my dream size 8. Week after week, being reduced. Then o marched in and bought it. in God's hands.

It has been a month nov one of two things has ha I've used up all my mirac will direct me to a woma major alterations.

I want to believe that watching over me and will for my weaknesses, but t times not the case. I used car in one of those spiral

Mid

WASATCH

Continued from S-1

he is looking for," says a friend who occasionally skis for Noble's camera. "He also seems to know exactly what the editors of various publications want. He doesn't waste time out there."

Unlike many other photographers, Noble doesn't have a darkroom. He doesn't need to make his own prints. "Most of the publications I've written for only need color slides anyway," he says. "And no one can develop Kodachrome but Kodak."

Because he's "paid his dues," Noble's talent is recognized. He no longer writes and takes photos on speculation. "I figure if the editors don't want to pay me up front to go to Alaska or wherever, they aren't really interested in publishing the article anyway," he says.

And as his talent becomes more recognized, Noble is branching out. He takes photos of river running, now. And sea kayaking. Both are sports he's just learning. He has to learn them because he is writing about and photographing them.

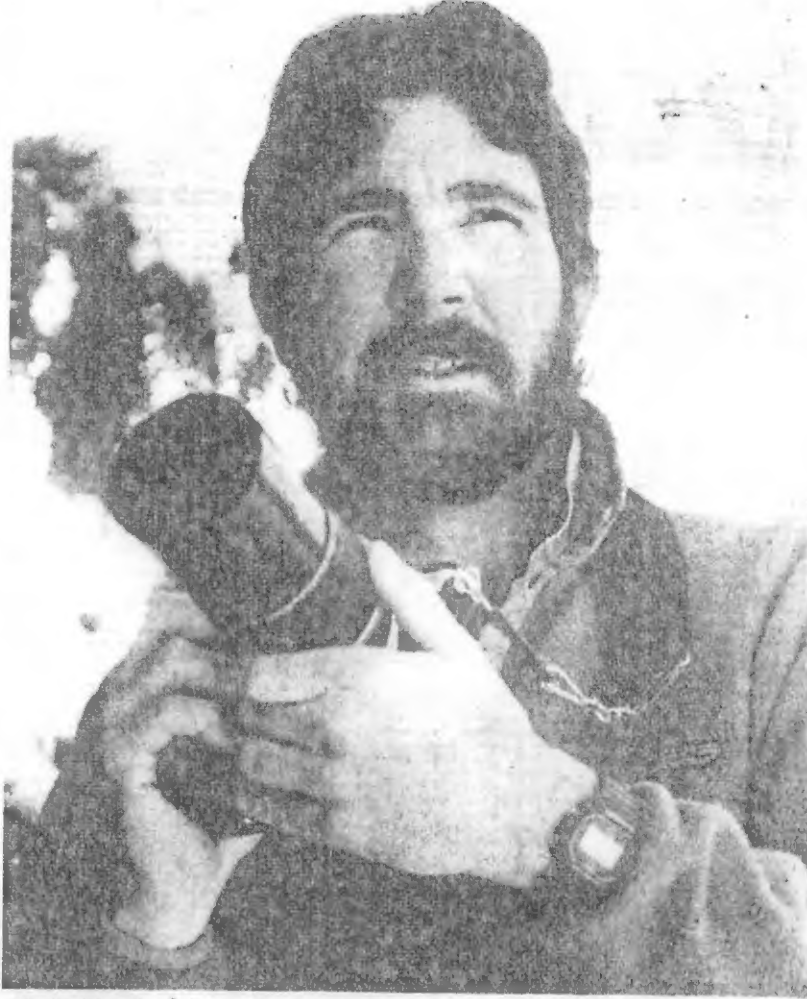

He has also begun taking wildlife photos. In Katmai National Park on the Alaskan Peninsula, Noble did what he considers to be some of his most important work. "The landscape is very subtle there," he says. "It lacks the drama of, say, the Alaskan Range." In this park, the last large sanctuary for the Alaskan brown bear, Noble found 10 or 12 bears together, at a river, feeding on salmon. He captured them on film.

Does wildlife photography seem more dangerous than adventure photography? "Not at all," says Noble. "Ski models are much less predictable than bears."

He talks about the time, in Germany, when he positioned himself under a cornice of snow to catch a skier as he came over the edge. Catch him on film, that is. But unfortunately Noble caught him quite literally.

Neither was hurt when the skier landed on him. "He didn't speak much English and I didn't speak much German. I guess I thought I was communicating where I wanted him to land," says Noble. "But he didn't quite get it."

From Germany to Alaska — sometimes it seems Noble is everywhere at once. A recent issue of Powder magazine carried two articles written and photographed by Chris Noble. One was an evaluation of the newest mountaineering skis, boots, and bindings. The other was a guide to hut-to-hut skiing in North America. "I write: Tonight for the first time in weeks, I find myself in a shelter major projects a year — either photographing or writing or both. Noble is gone from his Salt Lake home for months at a time. He just completed a guide to outdoor adventure in Alaska that he researched on three separate trips. The article will appear in June in Outside magazine.

Chris Noble takes photos from a sportsman's perspective.

His photos and articles have appeared in Outside, Backpacker, Powder and Geo magazines. Noble has written, also, an apocryphal-sounding story about a mountain-climber named John Slater. The story appears in a book called "Ascent: The Mountaineering Experience in Word and Image," published by the Sierra Club. It is a modern fairy tale about a climber who was lured to his death (or nearly) by a mysterious, ghostly woman. Perhaps because of the days and weeks he has spent in the wilderness, Noble believes in things not easily explained. Truth is in the eye of the beholder. He writes:

"I have found that when a man speaks what he thinks is the truth — and there are all kinds of truth — you can read the pain or the joy in his face as he speaks. A liar looks right to you, because he is always measuring the weight of his words as he goes but a man

believes — through words and pictures.

Chris Noble wants to take on larger projects: he is, now, at work on his first book, called "Utah Ski Guide," published by the Utah Geographic Series. The fact that his first book is about skiing in Utah is serendipitous. After skiing and taking pictures of the world's major mountains, Noble still recognizes what he has in his own backyard. In the upcoming lecture he will give on the Wasatch Front, Noble says, "I want to talk about what it means to have a mountain range like this, so close to an urban area."

Brooke Williams is writing the text for "Utah Ski Guide," and skiing each slope that Noble photographs. "Adventure photography is not a hobby with him," says Williams. "It is interesting to me that he took up this profession because he loves to ski, but that he loves photography so intensely that he sacrifices skiing to do it. When we are standing together at the top of a bowl of fresh powder, he leaves it untouched. He snakes off to the side, skiing through the trees, to set up for the shot — of me, making the first tracks through the snow."

Chris Noble will speak on "Recreation in the Wasatch" at 4 p.m.

A retur

By Mary Bowring

■ Mrs. Bowring is a living in Kaysville.

A film clip of the old show the other day pre- feature about the old ha- fering now become a sor- program, with many yo- and old people sitting, watch the antics of Ar- Aunt Bea.

Mayberry was such a American sort of place v- ing was good, the townsp- thetic and helpful to th- the sheriff firm but kind- cause there was no se- Small wonder that we a- turn to someplace akin

Now that Andy Gri- gained popularity, perha- question of time bef- Knows Best," "My Thre- zel," make their way bac- it is possible to tune in to Beaver," and one of my g- looks forward to watchi- dad. She likes it for wha- the happy memories of l-

It seems

If you don't believe th- their faith in something themselves, read on.

A woman in Wichita, sale on maternity clothe- off. The fact that neither married daughters were not deter her. She called ters, marched them in to clothes, using pillows to effect. In her maternal said, "I'll put this in God's be someday you will need

Here's the kicker. Today an has four grandchildren

With my luck, if I had b- ternity dress on sale, I - gained 40 pounds for no re-

I too have put my fu- hands of fate. Before the saw the dress of my dream size 8. Week after week, I being reduced. Then o- marched in and bought it. in God's hands.

It has been a month now one of two things has ha- I've used up all my miracle will direct me to a woman major alterations.

I want to believe that s- watching over me and will for my weaknesses, but th- times not the case. I used t- car in one of those spirali-